Scotiæ sedebant inter coronandum et secun-deportatus fuerat lapis ipse; nunc in West-minsterio est. lit. Lapis fatidicus, vel fatalis.

reges in eo marmore insidentes, usque ad Roberti primi Scottorum regis tempora, corona-rentur. Suprascriptio lapidi, longa post secula (ut res ipsa indicat), hæc est inscripta:

"Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum "Inveniant lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem."

Boethii Scot. Hist. Lib. i. fol. 2.
Thus translated by Holinshed:—"This stone was in fashion like a seat, or chaire, having such a fatal destinie, as the Scots say, following it, that wheresoever it should be found, there should the Scotsmen reign, and have the supreme governance. Hereof it came to pass, that first in Spaine, after in Ireland, and then in Scotland, the kings which ruled over the Scottishmen, received the crown sitting upon that stone, until the time of Robert the first, king of Scotland. The inscription also of the stone, though engraven long time after, as should appear, was this:

Except old sawes doo faille, and wizards wits be blind, The Scots in place must reign, where they this stone shall find."

Both the words "Lia," and "Fáil," are not indeed, now at least, intelligible, or known in Scotland, unless the former in some names of places, as, "Achanlia," i. e. Stony-field, at the head of Loch Suannart in Argyshire. Vox quidem Lia, itemque Fáil, vis, ac ne vix qui-dem, a Caledonibus modò intelliguntur, sed in multis locorum nominibus, compertæ, olim in usu fuisse liquet; sic, Achintlia, i. e. lapidum campus, qui est hodie sic appellatus in Argath-clia: comitatu locus.
